

France's Greatest Living Author Says Europe Will be "Swept Away" by Mass Migration

Description

EU: France's greatest living author Michel Houellebecq says Europe will be "swept away" by mass migration, adding that he was "shocked" that the 'great replacement' is treated as a conspiracy theory.

Houellebecq made the comments during a conversation with French philosopher Michel Onfray.

"The Great Replacement, I was shocked it's called a theory. It's not a theory, it's a fact," said Houellebecq. "When it comes to immigration, nobody controls anything, that's the whole problem. Europe will be swept away by this cataclysm."

Onfray agreed with him, asserting, "It's objectively what the figures say," in relation to the issue of massive demographic change.

Le grand remplacement, j'ai été choqué qu'on appelle ça une théorie, ce n'est pas une théorie, c'est un fait.

En matière d'immigration personne ne contrôle rien, c'est bien là tout le problème

"The fact that France's greatest living writer, as he is often described by the mainstream press, has said the Great Replacement is fact will only add to the growing body of intellectuals, academics, and politicians who have increasingly been willing to describe the Great Replacement in public forums," remarks John Cody.

While Onfray believes most of the migrants (many of whom are Muslim) will simply turn into consumers like everyone else, Houellebecq sees a far more violent future of “reverse Bataclans.”

“When entire territories are under Islamist control, I think acts of resistance will take place. There will be attacks and shootings in mosques,” said Houellebecq.

During a television debate back in January , French philosopher Alain Finkielkraut said it would take a “fanatical denial of reality” to disregard the “spectacular” demographic changes that are taking place in Europe.

A poll taken in April last year found that the majority of French citizens thought some form of “civil war” was likely as a result of failed multiculturalism and attacks on French identity.

The so-called ‘Great Replacement’ is the idea that leftist politicians are deliberately encouraging rapid levels of mass migration in order to replace native people with migrants whose descendents are more likely to vote for left-wing parties.

Whenever someone on the right suggests this is happening, they are vilified as a dangerous extremist, but whenever someone on the left points to the phenomenon as a good thing, they are lauded as a progressive thinker.

As we previously highlighted, new census figures out of the UK show that white Brits now make up less than 75% of the population in England and Wales.

Across England’s three biggest cities – Manchester, Birmingham and London, white Brits now represent a minority of the population.
