

Health Officials Target Younger People As Vaccination Rates Stall

Description

The ruling class still hasn't convinced enough people to roll up their sleeves and willingly take this experimental gene therapy shot. So they will continue to go after younger and younger people in order to make it happen.

Those interested in getting this jab have already done so, but too many are "hesitant" or are just plain refusing to take it. That means Joe Biden's goal of a 70% (shot up with the first dose) vaccination rate in the United States by June 4th is unlikely to happen.

But the percentage of North Carolina's total population that has been partially vaccinated against COVID-19 has been lingering around the 40% to 50% range for several weeks now. As of Tuesday, it was 44%, according to local ABC affiliate, ABC 13. So, the state is going after the younger population now.

"When we look at our younger populations, that's where we start to see our percent, at least partially vaccinated, start to decline a little bit," Buncombe County Public Health Director Stacie Saunders said. "We really started to put a lot of our efforts into additional outreach, to try to reach some of these younger populations where they are," Saunders said.

Idaho is also facing stalling vaccination rates. Only about 45% of state residents eligible for the vaccine, age 12 or older, have gotten at least one dose, according to a report by Boise State Public Radio. Weekly vaccinations in the state are at their lowest since January, when the shots were just available to health care workers, long-term care residents, first responders, and teachers.

New York City's totalitarian mayor, Bill de Blasio, previously set a goal of having 5 million residents fully vaccinated by the end of June. He has admitted that that won't happen, according to New York 1.

"It's gonna be very very tough at this point to hit 5 million by the end of June," de Blasio said, laying the blame with the federal government for briefly withdrawing the use of the Johnson & Johnson one-shot vaccine over safety concerns.

With stalling vaccination rates and many people (seemingly about half nationwide) staunchly opposed to taking this experimental gene therapy, it will be difficult to use any kind of mandate or force on the other half. Don't get me wrong, it is still possible that the government will make an attempt beyond propaganda and brainwashing to convince the holdouts, but it will likely have little success considering the number of Americans simply refusing the jab.

Stay alert and be aware of what's going on. They still could try anything as fewer want to take this shot.
