

Tony Blair Suggests Unvaccinated Should Remain Under Lockdown Restrictions

Description

UK: Says June 21st date can only be met if two groups are treated differently.

Former British Prime Minister Tony Blair implied that those who choose not to be vaccinated should be discriminated against by remaining under lockdown restrictions if the UK's June 21st "freedom day" is to be accomplished.

During an interview with ITV News, Blair was asked if he would delay the June 21st deadline, when all social distancing, mask mandates and other lockdown rules are supposed to come to an end.

Blair said that if the data suggested the June 21st date was at risk, the government should "look again at distinguishing between those people who are vaccinated and those people who aren't because it really makes no sense to treat the two groups as if they're the same."

The former Labour leader then attempted to offer a rebuttal to those who would describe this as discrimination, but only succeeded in affirming that he is advocating for discrimination against the unvaccinated.

"If someone simply chooses not to get vaccinated, I mean frankly that's their choice, you're not discriminating against them, they've chosen not to do it," said Blair.

In other words, Blair is suggesting that people who haven't taken the vaccine should be punished by remaining under lockdown rules while the rest of the population gets their freedoms back.

Blair's agenda in advocating discrimination against the unvaccinated isn't surprising given that he has been aggressively pushing the use of vaccine passports for almost a year.

Back in January, Blair asserted that Britain should take the lead in presiding over a global vaccine passport system.

“It’s going to be a new world altogether,” Blair proclaimed, adding “The sooner we grasp that and start to put in place the decisions [needed for a] deep impact over the coming years the better.”
